Argentina's industries. National statistical department's survey of yerba mate milling activities. Rev. River Plate 89(2536): 22-24. July 19, 1940. 286.8 R32
A recent industrial statistical survey shows that in 1938 52.3 percent of the maté milled in Argentina was imported. Statistics are given showing the activities of the Argentine mills in 1935, 1937 and 1938 and the production, consumption and import of mate from 1935 to 1939. Production control has been instituted by government decree. This is said to be made necessary by economic conditions.

This is a discussion of the cultural and economic conditions of production of yerba maté in the territory of Misiones in the extreme northeast of Argentina. It is peopled by settlers of whom many are German or of German descent, and who are, for the most part, owners of small or medium-sized farms. An unbiased account is given of the difficulties to be overcome and the results to be hoped for in the cultivation for commercial purposes of a product the use of which is limited to a few countries of South America.

Yerba maté. A problem of over-production. Rev. River Plate 88(2509): 18-19. Jan. 12, 1940. 236.3 R32

The writer points out that the yerba maté problem in Argentina is one "of over-production, aggravated by continued importation" and that Argentina, Brazil and Paraguay are reducing their output of the product. "The problem as a whole, i.e. as affecting all three producing countries, is one which seems to call for the greatest possible measure of cooperation among those countries, aiming primarily at finding new markets, and at the more intensified and assiduous 'cultivation' of the markets at present being catered for."
